

Pakistan Security Report 2011

PIPS security reports are the only major source on internal security in Pakistan as no official database is available in the country. Although the government has the resources, it lacks a reliable body that can gather and tabulate data from all offices and present it in an accurate and credible manner. That results in lack of uniformity, inconsistency and contradictions in official data. The conflict/security database and PIPS archives are the basic resources relied upon for this report. The archives and the database are the outcome of a meticulous monitoring process on every relevant incident in the country on a daily basis. A regular follow up is conducted in liaison with the PIPS correspondents in the regions in order to keep track of daily developments on such incidents. PIPS compiles data from sources including newspapers, magazines, journals, field sources and screening of official records. More than 30 English and Urdu dailies, magazines, and journals, and various television news channels are monitored to update the database and archives. Regional daily newspapers and weeklies from Peshawar, Quetta, Gilgit and Karachi are also monitored for details on incidents reported in the local media. Correspondents in provincial capitals are the primary source for PIPS to verify the media reports. In case of a major incident, PIPS teams consult the local administration and journalists for further details. In cases where PIPS finds it difficult to verify facts of a particular incident, it gives preference to the official statements in that regard.
